Just like human babies, baby crows rely on their parents for protection and nourishment. They spend their early days nestled in the safety of their nest, eagerly awaiting their parents' return with food.

On the other hand, baby pigeons, known as squabs, are equally adorable. They start their lives as small, naked, and helpless beings. However, within a couple of weeks, they transform into fluffy balls of feathers, ready to explore the world around them. Pigeons are known for their ability to adapt to urban environments, making them a common sight in many cities.
