Colonel Bourland's sphere of influence primarily spanned across North Texas and Indian Territory (present-day Oklahoma). His troops, comprised of Confederate soldiers and Native American allies, fought against Union forces as well as hostile Native American tribes who aligned themselves with the Union cause.

Conflict in Indian Territory

Indian Territory was a hotbed of violence and political turmoil during the Civil War. As a border region with a diverse population, it became a strategic battleground. Colonel Bourland and his men played a crucial role in defending Confederate interests in the area.

One of Bourland's notable achievements was his successful defense of Fort Smith, located in present-day Arkansas, against Union General James G. Blunt's incursion in 1863. The victory demonstrated Bourland's military prowess and his ability to rally troops under challenging circumstances.

Bourland's leadership was not limited to conventional warfare. He also spearheaded several campaigns against Native American tribes that sided with the Union. His efforts aimed to disrupt their supply lines, gather intelligence, and weaken their support to Union forces in the region.

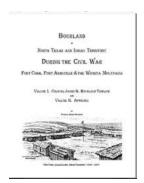

Post-War Years and Legacy

After the Civil War, Bourland faced challenges as he transitioned to civilian life. However, his reputation as a skilled leader and staunch Confederate supporter earned him respect among his peers. He continued to influence regional politics and advocate for the rights of Southern sympathizers in North Texas.

Colonel Bourland's legacy in North Texas and Indian Territory remains significant. Despite being overshadowed by more prominent figures from the Civil War era, his strategic contributions, military victories, and dedication to the Confederate cause cannot be overlooked.

Today, numerous historical markers and monuments pay tribute to Bourland's achievements. His story serves as a reminder of the complex and often overlooked aspects of the American Civil War and the individuals who played unique roles in shaping the country's history.

This book describes historical events during the civil war around North Texas and what was then called Indian Territory, now Oklahoma.

In April of 1863 the Texas Legislature granted $800,000 to the Confederates to recruit 18,000 soldiers to station them on the Red River. The two men in charge of the money were James G. Bourland, who was referred to as Colonel Bourland and William R. Hudson who was a Captain with the Texas State Troops. William R. Hudson, who called himself Brigadier General of Texas State Troops and Bourland, who called himself Colonel, both reported to U.S. Major General Samuel Bell Maxey.

This book identifies about 18,000 soldiers, from hand written records.

This work will prove valuable to any researcher or genealogist interested in finding information about their grandfathers who served between the beginning of the civil war to about 1865 with 243 militia listings and events in the area.
